Introduction

This booklet lists sources available within Sheffield Libraries Archives and Information for the study of the use and abuse of drugs, principally from the 18\textsuperscript{th} century onwards when there were few or no controls on drugs. Opium and laudanum were popular drugs used to manage pain - even among young babies who were teething. It was commonly available with chemists advertising cordials containing these drugs in local newspapers. There are numerous references in the 19\textsuperscript{th} century to accidental overdoses of the drug.

By the mid-late 19\textsuperscript{th} century governments attempted to restrict and control the supply of drugs - almost all of which were used for pain relief rather than recreational pleasure. At the turn of 20\textsuperscript{th} century with the advent of safer drugs for managing pain attention turned to recreational use (or abuse). As the 20\textsuperscript{th} century progressed more and more restrictions were placed on the supply and use of certain drugs. Also by the later decades of the century new problems emerged, such as solvent abuse (or glue sniffing) and the rise of new drugs such as ecstasy.

As more items in the Sheffield collections are catalogued and the collections are used by researchers it is likely that additional references to drugs will come to light. In addition we actively seek out research reports and documentation relating to current drug issues. More detailed searching of our catalogues for a broad range of relevant terms may reveal additional material. It is always worth contacting us or checking our website for updates to this study guide. Our contact details are on the back cover.
