Prior to 1801 (when the first official census was undertaken) figures can only be estimates. Note also figures prior to 1801 may refer to either the township or the larger parish of Sheffield. Throughout the 20th century the boundary of Sheffield expanded due to local government boundary changes (see the text below for more detail). From 1801 figures are taken from http://www.visionofbritain.org.uk/data_cube_page.jsp?data_theme=T_POP&data_cube=N_TOT_POP&u_id=10076882&c_id=10001043&add=N
The population of Sheffield before 1801 can only be tentatively estimated from incomplete statistics which refer, from century to century, to different areas and different sections of the population.

For instance, Sheffield is found in the Domesday Book (1086) as a sub-division of the larger manor of Hallam\(^2\). The manor as a whole contained enough arable land to occupy twenty plough teams. In actual use there were two teams belonging to the lord of the manor (working his demesne\(^3\)) and 12 ½ teams belonging to the thirty villeins\(^4\) who are the only inhabitants mentioned. There would, of course, be officials who carried out manorial business and their households, and each villein was the head of a household (possibly some of them of two households living together). The usual device of multiplying such recorded figures by five gives a population of between 150 and 200. This is a small number for so large an area even by 11\(^{th}\) century standards; it is comparable to that of the two Staffordshire hundreds in the tail end of the Pennines, the rest of Stafford (not a rich county) being twice as populous. In the sub-manors of Sheffield and Attercliffe together, there was work for three plough teams, but the Domesday clerks do not say how many were actually in use. The population there was presumably about a sixth that of the rest of Hallam.

In 1297 there were enough “free tenants” to obtain from the lord of the manor the charter which made Sheffield a manorial borough\(^5\). Their number is unknown; their lands were all in the centre of Sheffield. They were probably descendents of the Domesday workers in the castle and on the demesne; the earliest known names of Free Tenants include none of gentle origin, but many manufacturers and traders.

The next document of interest is the roll of those assessed for the poll tax of 1379\(^6\). Places were assessed by the “vill”, or township; Sheffield, Bradfield and Ecclesfield (the parishes which formerly made up the manor of Hallam) are all called “vills”, which suggests that the parish of Sheffield was not yet divided into the six townships which later became the units of local government. The number of people who paid the tax in Sheffield included wives and a certain number of dependants and servants. As we have no means of knowing how many were too poor to pay, it is safer to count the number of householders and multiply, as before, by five. This calculation gives the population as about 2,200; a very fair size for a mediaeval parish. It is of interest to compare the state of Sheffield at this time with the neighbouring places. There were only about the same number of people in Doncaster, but they paid just ten times the tax. Rotherham paid almost the same tax as Sheffield, with two thirds the number of people. Rotherham and Ecclesfield paid the same amount and Bradfield a little less, though Bradfield's population was nearly as large as that of Rotherham, while Ecclesfield's was smaller than either. It seems clear that the majority of Sheffield people were rather poor; in the surrounding parishes there were many families of gentry, wealthy in a modest way, but in Sheffield there was only one knight; all others were just plain traders and manufacturers.

This continued to be the case. In 1615, an often quoted report\(^7\) was made to Gilbert, 7th Earl of Shrewsbury, by his officers, who stated that in the town there were 2,207 people, of whom the majority were "poor artificers", their children and servants. These people in the built-up area were not typical of those in the outer townships, in which a number of very comfortably circumstanced families certainly existed. An analysis of the parish registers from their beginning to 1600\(^8\) suggests that the population of the whole parish was about 3,000.

An increase of less than 1,000 in the course of two centuries seems very small, but until the latter part of the 17th century few people lived in towns if they could help it. To take up urban residence was to invite an early death; and even in the country the birth rate barely exceeded the death rate.

These conditions had not altered much in 1692, when an assessment of Sheffield was made for the poll tax for financing the French wars\(^9\); it gives 671 names of householders in the town (again the interesting particulars given of dependants and servants only include those liable to tax); the usual multiplication by five gives 3,355; so that probably the total population of the parish had risen to 5,000.

After 1700, it was no longer quite so lethal to live in towns, and in Sheffield the results of the vigorous industrial life of the period were shown in a big jump to the first definite figure of population. It was placed by Ralph Gosling on the printed map of Sheffield which he published in 1736\(^10\). The figure given is 9,695 but where he got it does not seem to be known; it is, however, quite a likely one. Lloyd suggests that by 1750 there may have been 12,000 in the town and 20,000 in the parish\(^11\). In 1776, Captain T. Buck, in a letter\(^12\) to the 2nd Marquis of Rockingham, reported that "Mr Wilkinson" (probably James Wilkinson, Vicar of Sheffield) estimated the population to be 17,000 in the town and 50,000 in the parish, which calculations I should rather think too low.” It was an era of rapidly increasing populations, largely due to a drop in the incidence of many killing diseases, which increased to a spectacular extent as the century wore on.

All this time Sheffield, like other towns of the north and midlands, had lagged well behind the older, industrial centres of the south. In the early nineteenth century these older towns were rapidly overtaken, and the present distribution of population (apart from the unceasing growth of London) had come about by the middle of that century.

In 1801 the first census was taken, and for the first time an authoritative figure for the whole population can be quoted\textsuperscript{13}. The area of Sheffield remained reasonably static until 1900. Thereafter the city boundary expanded into parts of Derbyshire and the West Riding of Yorkshire and the population figures reflect this enlargement.

1821 onwards
Sheffield trade directories quote census figures from 1821 onwards. Be aware of the area for which each figure is quoted (for instance there will be separate figures for places like Ecclesfield, Dore, Totley, Norton, Bradfield, etc., until they were absorbed into the city boundary in the 20th century). Occasional discrepancies are due to the fact that in several cases a change in boundary almost coincided with the taking of the census.
Trade directories are available at both Sheffield Local Studies and Sheffield Archives.
